What people appreciate about me

People tell me that I am approachable and always try and make time to help them.

My family would say that I work too hard but they appreciate that I am ambitious in what I do and that my work is important to me.

My grown-up children tell me they appreciate my support when they come to me for advice even though I do nag them a bit.

My husband appreciates my cooking – I think?

What is important to me

My family network is very important to me as they give me support and we have a good laugh when we are all together. I enjoy spending time with my parents who have always been there for me, and it is important to me that I support them now however I can.

My children are both at university and it is important to me that I do all I can to support them to become confident adults who can meet their true potential.

It is important to me that I can work in a team and collaborate with others to explore ideas and try things out. I like responsibility and enjoy leading others to achieve things that are for the greater social good.

Good manners, fairness and equality are important to me.

How to support me

I hate mornings – please understand I am not at my best when I am tired.

I have 50% hearing, so please be patient if I ask you to repeat things or I look at little blank at what you have said – I find emails easier than phone calls, but even better if we talk in person without lots of background noise.

Smile at me – I get on best with people who are happy and enjoying what they do.

Learn with me – my motto is 'everyday is a school day'. I like people who don't think they know everything and learn from others.
